There have been few systematic studies of the acute psychological impact of the diagnosis of AML, an 'orphan' disease, often associated with a poor response to therapy, early mortality and unpredictable length of survival. This study reports on the final evaluations of patients (n=48) and their partners who had undergone a bone marrow transplant for AML, whether AML-free (n=19) or relapsed/refractory (n=29). The response of patients and partners to their diagnosis and to the transplant procedure was assessed using the Psychological Impact of Events Scale (PIES). Partners of patients were also assessed using the General Health Questionnaire (GHQ-12) and the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory-2 (MMPI-2). Compared with both survivors and their partners, AML-free patients had lower levels of anxiety and depression and reduced distress. Relapsed/refractory patients were more distressed (higher levels of anxiety and depression, lower levels of hostility and GHQ-12). Both patients and partners of AML-free patients reported less disruption in home life, less fear and less frequent insomnia than partners of AML-free patients. Partners of AML-free patients reported lower levels of anxiety and depression than those of relapsed/refractory patients and their counterparts. These findings may not be disease-specific but may be associated with more open and supportive treatment regimens and more openness and helpfulness in the management of this group of patients.[Therapeutic experience with the Erchonia-Eclipse-T system for the treatment of diabetes mellitus type 2. 6-month follow f678ea9f9e
